On design choices

"What's the most compelling visual entry point, and how do we earn our way into the details? Sometimes a lighter, more playful visual actually creates more depth because it builds curiosity first. The design has to make readers want to stay, and once they do, they're more open to sitting with complexity."

"I try to let the content lead every design decision … When the visuals and the storytelling are genuinely aligned in tone, the whole thing clicks in a way that you can feel.

"Design is an integral part of the story, not just a supporting role."

On restraint

"I hope readers don't take much notice of the design at all in [my work], that they're left to focus instead on the stories that are being told. My favorite designs are those that are seen but not heard, that amplify the stories but don't distract from them."

"My goal as a designer is almost always to act with as light of a design touch as possible. I think there are many times when it's appropriate and necessary for a designer to let that design carry a package visually."
